

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

27251.36.2

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY

©

SELECTIONS

FROM THE

KALEVALA

Translated from a German version

BY Addition
JOHN A. PORTER M.D.

LATE PROFESSOR IN YALE COLLEGE

WITH AN INTRODUCTION AND ANALYSIS OF THE POEM

NEW YORK
LEYPOLDT & HOLT
1868

23

~~27251.36.2~~

Harvard College Library,

Nov. 14, 1891.

LOWELL BEQUEST.

27251.36.2

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by

MRS. JOHN A. PORTER

In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

THE NEW YORK PRINTING COMPANY,
81, 83, and 85 Centre Street,
NEW YORK.

27251

E
C

251.36.2

Harvard College Library,

Nov. 14, 1891.

LOWELL BEQUEST.

27251.36.2

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1869, by
MRS. JOHN A. PORTER
In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Concord,
Street,

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

THIS volume contains the fourth of a series of great foreign poems which the publishers are trying to engraft upon American literature.

The first one issued was King René's Daughter, from the Danish. This has already passed to a second edition. It was followed by Frithiof's Saga, from the Swedish, with an introduction by Bayard Taylor. The third of the series is Lessing's immortal Nathan the Wise, which has lately been presented to American readers for, strange to say, the first time, through the translation of Miss Ellen Frothingham of Boston.

The present volume contains selections from the Kalevala, which were made by the late Professor Porter, after a long familiarity with the work, as forming the most interesting narrative, or episode, which it contains, and as being sufficient, without wearying the reader with uninteresting mythological details, and monotonous repetition, to give a just idea of the matter and manner of the poem. The translations were made from a close German version, by Professor Porter, to while away the hours of the long illness which terminated his valuable life.

The introduction and analysis of the poem have been prepared by a competent scholar, and will be found to contain valuable information on subjects which heretofore have hardly received just attention from American writers.

Not having been able to learn that any other English translation from the great national epic of the Finns has ever appeared, the publishers present this one with special confidence in its claims upon the attention of all cultivated readers.

CONTENTS.

INTRODUCTION	7
ANALYSIS OF THE KALEVALA	22
WAINAMOINEN'S SOWING	49
THE RIVAL MINSTRELS.	59
THE ENCOUNTER	67
YOUKAHAINEN'S SONG	73
THE ENCHANTMENT	83
THE BETROTHAL	95
THE WOOING	107
THE CONSOLATION	117
THE FLIGHT	129
NOTES	146

INTRODUCTION.

ABOUT the eastern coasts of the Baltic Sea live a million and a half of people, the last remnants of a race which has been pressed back from the Ural by advancing tribes. They inhabit a land of marshes and lakes, and call themselves Suomilainen, fen-dwellers ; to us they are known by the name of Finns. Of their congeners in Lapland, Russia, Hungary, and Bulgaria, only the Magyars have become civilized. The Finns are even more advanced than these. Their literature, and especially their popular poetry, show a high intellectual development, even in a very distant time—so far back indeed as to belong almost to the mythical period.

Finland, with its deep bays and inlets, its granite mountains and its lakes, its change of long sad winters with short and warm springs and summers, with its dense forests and roaring water-falls, is the consecrated ground of the dreamy imagination, which now rises to embrace the terrible and the huge, and now sinks to take in the minute and particular. The men are strongly built, with pleasant faces and prominent cheek-bones; their hair is light, but later in life turns brown; their beards are thin, and their eyes gray. Their anger is slow and quiet, their speech earnest, and their faith always pledged by their words. The Finn believes, as no one else does, in the power of words, and with him words disposed in a song have a magical influence. The belief in magic has always had a strong hold on him, and even now in the country districts, incantations and charms are still used in spite of a belief in Christianity and the penalties of the law.

The mythology of the people is peculiar, and seems almost autochthonous. Certainly it has no close resemblance to that of any other people except the Esthonians, who live on the opposite side of the Gulf of Finland. It, of course, has the same general ideas which run through all mythologies which have been developed from poetical versions of natural phenomena. A close analysis might explain many of the legends in like way with those of Greece and India. Room for comparison might be found between Wainamoinen, Achilles, and the northern Sigurd, and in many minor points also the same idea is developed similarly in different races. But yet the religion bears the peculiar impress of the climate and the region as well as of the race. In it, of course, magic plays an important part. The traditions which have been handed down from mouth to mouth in popular songs, are so various and so contradictory that it is a matter of some difficulty to unravel and harmonize them, and to state exactly what the Finnish mythology actually was, and only one or two general statements can be made.

Jumala, the heaven, is the name of the great Divinity, the creator and ruler of all things.

Out of this come various spiritual powers, which rule the different appearances and phenomena of nature. When the supreme power becomes more personified it is called Ukko, the old one, the father. He rules over the clouds and sends the rain. The wind is his breath, the thunder his voice, the lightnings his sword, and the rainbow his bow. His consort is the earth-mother, which produces all and takes all back in her bosom. Their children are Wainamoinen and Ilmarinen, heroes and demi-gods. The former, who is old from his birth, is the lord of wisdom, of song, and of music; the latter is the king of the winds, of water, of fire, and especially of the forge. One represents the intellectual, the other the physical powers of man. All the objects in nature are ruled by minor powers. Tapio, with his hat of fir leaves, and his wife Miellikki, rule over the forests and their inhabitants. Ahti rules the lakes and the seas. Tuoni sways the realms of death. Kauna reigns over the tombs.

Songs telling these stories of the Finnish mythology, and of the great deeds of Wainamoinen, Ilmarinen, and Lemminkainen, were long known to exist among the Finnish peasantry; but till the early part of this century few had been reduced to writing, and no systematic effort had been made for their collection. In 1822 Dr. Zacharias Topelius made a collection of poems, which he published in five parts. About the same time Professor von Becker, in a Finnish journal appearing at Abo, made an endeavor to reduce the poems concerning Wainamoinen to some unity. It was probably this example that gave Dr. Elias Lönnrot the idea of collecting all the poems still existing with regard to the three brothers of Kaleva, and weaving them into one whole. At all events he set himself to seek for this popular poetry, and for the links which bound it together. During entire years he wandered from cabin to cabin, in the most remote districts, sitting at the hearth of the peasant and the fisherman, asking the old man and the child, listening with an attentive ear to their tales, sometimes uncertain and confused, and writing gladly down what rewarded him for his undertaking. At last, after he had made a long stay with the Finns of the distant province of Archangel, near the White Sea, he attained his end, and in 1835 he published his collection of epic poems under the title of Kalevala (from Kava, the mighty one). It included about 12,000 lines, and was divided into thirty-two runes or cantos. At the same time he published with the name of Kanteletar (from kantele, a harp), a collection of lyric poems, which he had collected in the same way. The importance of the Kalevala was at once appreciated by all Finland, and indeed by learned men throughout Europe. Jacob Grimm, especially, published an excellent disquisition on the Finnish epic. It was at once translated into Swedish by Alexander Castrén, the philologist, and in 1845 into French prose, after a fashion, by M. Léouzon Le Duc, in his book La Finlande. Meanwhile further researches were made among the people, and new songs and parts of songs were found, which Dr. Lönnrot incorporated into the work, and a new edition was published in 1849, which included 22,793 verses, and was divided into fifty runes. In 1852 a German translation of this was published by Anton Schiefner. A new Swedish translation is now being made by Mr. Karl Collan, the librarian of the public library at Helsingfors, of which the first half has just been published.

The appearance of the Kalevala was very opportune for the believers in the Wolfian theory of the origin of the Homeric poems. Here was a long epic poem, with as much unity of plot as the Iliad, yet made up from songs collected from different mouths, and actually pieced out after it had once been published, by new additions to almost every part. The men who had learned the songs from their ancestors were still in existence, and the authenticity of the poem could be, and was verified. Dr. Lönnrot was no MacPherson, and all his contemporaries give him credit for the utmost good faith. Not a single line or part of a line was added by him.

But the beauty of the poem is no less remarkable than the mode of its discovery. Mr. Max Müller says in his Lectures on the Science of Language, and he only echoes the voice of all scholars and critics : " From the mouths of the aged an epic poem has been collected equalling the Iliad in length and completeness, nay, if we can forget for a moment all that we in our youth learned to call beautiful, not less beautiful. A Finn is not a Greek, and a Wainamoinen was not a Homer. But if the poet may take his colors from that nature by which he is surrounded, if he may depict the men with whom he lives, Kalevala possesses merits not dissimilar from those of the Iliad, and will claim its place as the fifth national epic of the world, side by side with the Ionian songs, with the Mahábhárata, the Shahnámeh, and the Nibelunge." There breathes throughout the spirit of the country which produced it. Little touches and short phrases open up to us long vistas of birch forest, with glimpses of the roaring waterfall. We see the deep green lakes, and live in the innermost life of the peasants and fishermen who inhabit their shores. We see the three great heroes of Finland, and their figures are not dimly drawn, but we are awed by their mighty presence. The spells of magic which Wainamoinen throws over his enemies, and with which he gives life to the dead, are thrown over us, and we read eagerly of his heroic deeds. In one passage, the birth of the harp, a sublimity is reached which is without parallel in other epics. With the simplicity of all early people and poets, no details are too minute or too unworthy of a place in the verse, and we behold the life of Finland without any conventional drapery.

In the story of the Kalevala there is a certain unity of plot. It can be briefly described as a struggle between the good and the evil powers.

ers of the universe. Wainamoinen, Ilmarinen, and Lemminkainen, the heroes of Kaleva, a land of plenty and happiness, are on one side; and Louhi, Hiisi, Tuoni, Youkahainen, Kullervo, and their various supporters from Pohiola, situate in the cold of the extreme north, and from Tuonela, the realm of death, are on the other. After various struggles and contests, from the creation of the world down; and after numerous attempted reconciliations and agreements, with marriage of the children of light to the daughters of darkness, the bad powers are defeated and overwhelmed, and Wainamoinen gains the final victory. It is the old contest between light and darkness, which the people of the north know only too well. Yet, while a general design may be traced, the Kalevala is rather a cycle of songs than a poem. These songs are sometimes inconsistent, and are evidently the work of different minds at different ages. But as each song has received additions and changes at each generation, they do not differ in general character or in style. They have a common author, the whole Finnish people. Wainamoinen, Ilmarinen, and Lemminkainen have each their own set of legends, in which their separate and their joint adventures are related. Hence the poem is full of episodes, and a portion of it can be presented to the public at a time.

One very noticeable feature of the poem is the stress which is laid upon magical power. It might indeed have been expected from the character of the people, but still it stands out here as in no other people's poems or legends. Wainamoinen the hero, the god of poetry and music, accomplishes nearly everything by magic. His songs disarm his antagonists; they appease the eagle of the storm; they throw a whole people into a deep sleep; they give warmth to the new sun and moon which Ilmarinen forges out of copper; they give life to his new wife which he makes out of gold and silver. Lemminkainen is the son of a sorceress; he is restored to life by charms and spells; he returns safely from the most marvellous adventures by the same means. Even Ilmarinen is unable successfully to fabricate his works without the use of magic on his fire and his forge. The sun and moon too are stolen from heaven and hid away by magic.

Another singular thing about the Kalevala, which springs from the fact of its being handed down orally, is the occasional introduction of Christian ideas. There are once in a while glimpses of a Trinity, and the sorceress of Pohiola speaks to her daughter as to a Christian girl. A Christian ending is even given to the Pagan epic. The virgin Maryatta bears a son, whom Wainamoinen in consideration of his magical birth orders to be killed without being baptized. But the child speaks, and convicts him of injustice, at which Wainamoinen becomes very sad and confused. The child, who is no other than Christ, grows up and becomes king of Kaleva, and Wainamoinen, unable to endure the new dispensation, sails away into the West, leaving his harp and his songs as a legacy to Finland.

The Kalevala is written in eight-syllabled trochaic verse. That is the peculiar and characteristic metre of the Finns, and nearly all their poems are in this form. Poetry is their natural speech ; and the mother as she hushes her babe, and the old man telling stories to the children around the hearth, insensibly fall into verse. The genius of their language helps them to this, for it is strongly trochaic both in accent and quantity. Even ordinary speech is at times metrical. There is no rhyme, except by accident, but much alliteration. It is not uncommon for all the words in several lines to begin with the same letter. This too is helped by the language, for there are only nineteen letters in Finnish, and several of these are never used at the beginning of a word. Another peculiarity of this metre is that a second verse or half verse is almost always the echo of the preceding, varying it and introducing a new image, or repeating the thought in other words. Hence the vocabulary is very large, and everything in common use has numerous names. The metre, both in the simple form and with this peculiarity of the echo, is familiar to English readers through Mr. Longfellow's Hiawatha, and it is impossible to read the Kalevala without comparing it to Hiawatha, and thinking that it was the great example which set Mr. Longfellow about producing his beautiful poem, so similar to the Kalevala in general scope as well as in metre.

A specimen of the original is annexed, beginning at verse 235 of the third Rune :

" Vaka vanha Wäinämöinen :

Sen varsin valehtelitti,
Ei sinua silkein nähdy,
Kun on merta kyanettihin,
Meren kolkot kuokittihin,
Kala-haavat kaivettihin,
Kuuahutta kuletettaissa
Aurinkoa autettaissa,
Otavaa ojennettaissa,
Taivon tihitettihissä,
Miekkojasi, miehiksi,
Tuurinesi, tuuminesi,

Waa kuitaki, kulkienki
Lähe on miehen mitalihin
Siinä kumosi katala,
Kerallasi hahno suukka."

The portion of the Kalevala here published consists of the third and fourth Runes, with portions of the first and second. It was translated at the suggestion and advice of a Finnish friend, by the late Professor John A. Porter, of Yale College, who was eminent for his love of and study in literature. With this poem and with some translations from the Swedish, he wore away the weary hours of his lingering illness, till his death in August, 1866, brought the work to an unexpected termination. The part done, however, is complete in itself, and includes the episode of the contest between Wainamoinen and Youkahainen, and will suffice to give English readers an idea of the poem. A careful comparison with the original shows that the translation is as exact as the different genius of the two languages will permit.

New York, July 26, 1867.

E. S.

ANALYSIS OF THE KALEVALA.

AFTER a short introduction the poem proceeds in this way: The daughter of the air lets herself down into the sea, where by the winds and the waves she becomes pregnant and a mother of waters. A duck, seeking a resting-place, builds its nest on her knees and lays in it six golden eggs and a seventh of iron. As the duck broods, the eggs become so warm as to burn her lap, whereupon she lets them drop into the sea, where they are broken, and out of their parts are produced earth, heaven, sun, moon, and stars. The mother of waters then creates points of land, bays, coasts, depths and shallows of the sea. After thirty years Wainamoinen tears open the breast of the mother of waters, and is born. He is carried about for a long time by the waves, but at last reaches the shore.

Wainamoinen comes out on the land, which is then treeless, and has Sampsa Pellerwoinen plant it with trees. The oak at first will not grow, but after repeated plantings it sprouts and spreads out so broad and thick over the country that the rays of the sun and the moon cannot penetrate it. A dwarf, who speedily changes to a giant, rises out of the sea and fells the oak, whereon the sun and the moon are again visible. Birds sing in the trees; herbs, flowers, and berries grow out of the ground; only the barley does not yet thrive. Wainamoinen at last finds some grains of barley in the sand of the sea-shore, and fells the forest, leaving only a birch-tree standing as a perch for the birds. Out of gratitude for this, an eagle brings him fire, with which he burns the trees and brush. He then sows the barley, and prays for its growth.

Then follows the story given in this translation.

Wainamoinen wishes to fish Youkahainen's sister out of the sea, and gets her on his hook in the shape of a fish, which he is about to cut in pieces, when she escapes into the sea and explains who she really is. Wainamoinen tries in vain with charms and nets to get her again in his power; but at last gives up in despair and goes sorrowing home, and follows his mother's advice to go to the Northland and woo himself a wife there.

Youkahainen, in hatred against Wainamoinen, contrary to the advice and wishes of his father and mother, lies in wait for Wainamoinen as he goes to the Northland. He sees him riding over the sea, and shoots at him, but hits his horse. Whereupon Wainamoinen plunges into the water, and a violent tempest carries him over the surface of the sea, and Youkahainen goes home lamenting his want of success.

Wainamoinen swims several days on the open sea; the eagle, still grateful for the birch-tree left in the barley field, takes him on his back and carries him to the shore of the Northland, where Louhi, the mistress of Pohiola, finds him weeping, and gives him refuge and comfort in her house, and treats him exceedingly well. Wainamoinen, however, desires to go home, but Louhi will not let him go unless he will forge her the Sampo* out of swan feathers, a thread of wool, a grain of wheat, and a piece of a distaff—promising him her daughter in marriage. Wainamoinen cannot do this, but promises that when he gets home he will send her his brother Ilmarinen to forge the Sampo, and obtains from her a horse and sledge to take him home.

On the way he meets the charming maiden of the Northland, the daughter of Pohiola, and tries to induce her to take a seat by his side and go with him as his bride. After many refusals she consents, provided he can split a horse-hair with a knife without a point, strike an egg without breaking it, and build a boat on a rock of the slivers of her spindle and get it to the water without moving it in any way or letting his axe touch the rock. In the third trial he cuts his knee with his axe. He tries to heal himself, but he has forgotten the magic words, and goes in search of some sorcerer who can stop the flow of blood. He finds at last an old man, who promises to cure him if he will tell him the origin of iron.

* Each commentator gives a different interpretation to the Sampo—some making it to be an image of the god Jumala, others some mysterious ornate seat, and others simply a hand-mill to grind wheat, like the salt-mill of the Scandinavian mythology.

Wainamoinen sings to the old man the origin of iron and of steel, and the old man curses iron for its evil nature, and staunches the blood by a charm. His son prepares a salve, and he anoints and binds up the wound. Wainamoinen becomes stronger than before, and thanks God for the help granted to him.

Wainamoinen returns home and asks Ilmarinen to woo the Northern maiden for him by forging the Sampo. Ilmarinen says that he will never go to the Northland, but Wainamoinen by enchantment raises a tempest, and compels him to go against his will. When he arrives there he is hospitably received by Louhi, and is asked to forge the Sampo. After searching long for a place and materials for his forge, and after working for many days, and finding undesired things emerge from his fire, he at last succeeds in forging the Sampo, which Louhi shuts safely up in a mountain of copper. Ilmarinen demands the maiden as his reward ; but she is loath, and says she cannot yet leave home. Ilmarinen obtains a boat, returns home, and tells Wainamoinen that he has already forged the Sampo.

Lemminkainen, the son of a skilful sorceress, as passionate and bold as Wainamoinen is prudent and reserved, now comes upon the scene. He starts out to woo the best of the maidens of Saari. They at first mock him, but soon become enamored of him. Only one of them, Kyllikki, on whose account he had come, he cannot win, and finally seizes her and carries her off with him in his sledge. She weeps and objects to the warlike tastes of Lemminkainen, so that he promises her not to go to war, if she will not go to the village dances. Lemminkainen's mother rejoices over her new daughter-in-law.

Kyllikki, vexed that Lemminkainen stays out one whole night fishing, breaks her oath and goes to the village dance, whereupon Lemminkainen becomes very angry and resolves to divorce her at once, and go to the Northland for another wife. His mother seeks to dissuade him, telling him he will certainly be destroyed. Lemminkainen, who is brushing his hair, angrily throws the brush to the floor, and says that blood will flow from that brush as soon as from his body. He therefore starts off, comes to the Northland, and enchants all the men into a deep sleep except a herdsman, who seems too wretched to apprehend harm from. The herdsman runs off and lies in wait to kill Lemminkainen when he returns.

Lemminkainen asks Louhi for her daughter; but to obtain her he must catch a reindeer in the domain of Hiisi, the terrible giant that rules the forests. He catches it once, but if gets away, and when he has nearly come up to it again he breaks his snow-shoes.

At last, after praying for success, he again gets the reindeer into his power and brings it to the Northland. A second task is then imposed on him, to bridle the fire-breathing horse of Hiisi, which he accomplishes also. A third task is to shoot the swan on the river of Tuoni, or of death. There he is surprised by the despised herdsman, who throws against him a venomous serpent, and then casts his body into the water-fall of the Death-realm, where Tuoni's sons cut it into pieces.

One day, in Lemminkainen's home, blood begins to trickle from his brush, whereon his mother at once concludes that her son has met with some misfortune. She flies with the wings of the lark to Pohiola, and asks Louhi what she has done with Lemminkainen. After several falsehoods, Louhi tells her for what she has sent him, and the sun gives her exact information about his death. She then makes herself a long steel rake, with teeth a hundred ells long, goes to the water of Tuoni, and rakes up one by one the members of her son. When she has obtained all the pieces she fits them together, and by means of enchantments and magic salve brought to her from heaven by a bee, she restores Lemminkainen to life. After he returns to consciousness he tells his mother how he came to be thrown into the stream, and goes home with her.

Wainamoinen resolves to go again to Pohiola for his bride, but when building his boat he forgets the three magic words requisite to finish it, and prosecute his voyage. When he does not find them in the brain of the swallows, in the head of the swans, on the wings of the wild-geese, or on the tongue of the reindeer, he goes to Tuonela, the home of the dead, in search of them. The daughters of Tuoni refuse to tell him, but try to keep him a prisoner, and when they think him asleep, put a net of iron over him. Wainamoinen changes himself into a pebble and rolls into the river, then he turns to a snake and escapes through the net ; and as he comes home sings of the punishments that there befall wicked men.

Wainamoinen then goes to get the three words from Antero Wipunen, but the way is long and hard ; he has to pass over the points of young girls' needles, over the sharp swords of men, over the battle-axes of heroes. He makes himself shoes, gloves, and armor of iron, and sets out. At last he reaches the place where Wipunen sleeps so deeply that a thick forest has grown up out of him. He cuts down the trees and wakes Wipunen by plunging an iron stake into his mouth. Wipunen attempts to bite and devour him, but is prevented by the iron, which makes him suffer the most grievous pangs. Wainamoinen refuses to leave him until he has learned the magic words. At last Wipunen consents, and sings him all his wisdom ; whereupon Wainamoinen leaves him in peace, goes home and finishes his boat.

Wainamoinen sets sail in his new boat to the Northland. Ilmarinen's sister sees him and talks with him from the shore and finding out where he is going, hastens to tell her brother that another is going after his bride while he is loitering at home. Ilmarinen arrays himself and hurries on horseback along the shore to the Northland, and overtakes Wainamoinen. Both agree to woo peaceably and abide by the decision of the young girl. When Louhi sees them coming she advises her daughter to choose Wainamoinen. But she prefers Ilmarinen, because he is young, and because he forged the Sampo, and receives Wainamoinen with a refusal.

Ilmarinen has three tasks imposed on him : to plough a field full of serpents, to bring the bear of Tuoni and the wolf of Manala, and lastly, to catch a pike in the river of death without line or net. By the counsel of the Northland maiden he successfully accomplishes all these things, and the marriage is arranged. Wainamoinen returns home dejected, warning every one never to go wooing in company with a younger man.

Nuptial preparations are being made at Pohiola. They kill for the banquet a great ox, whose head and tail touch the extreme borders of Finland, whose horns even are so far apart, that it takes a whole day for a swallow to fly the distance. They work during a whole summer and a whole winter at brewing the beer for the guests. The squirrel and the marten bring the ingredients to ferment it, the magic bird pours into it honey that it flew over nine seas to obtain. Louhi invites all the people of the Northland and of Kaleva to the wedding, except Lemminkainen.

Even Wainamoinen gets over his grief sufficiently to come with his harp and to sing for three whole days.

The bride is prepared for her journey, and is reminded of earlier days, so that she finally falls to weeping. She is consoled by being told how she will live in the home of her husband. The bridegroom on his part is exhorted to treat his wife well, and not to be too hard with her. An old beggar tells a story of how he once brought his wife to reason. The bride, though very sad at leaving her birthplace, at last bids all farewell, and is put into the sledge by Ilmarinen, and they start. On the evening of the third day they reach home and are received there. The guests feast merrily at a great supper, with much drink. Wainamoinen sings the praise of the host, the hostess, the groomsmen, the bridesmaids, and of the rest of the company. On his way home from the wedding, Wainamoinen breaks his sledge, but he mends it again, and reaches home.

Lemminkainen, full of spite that he was not invited to the wedding, resolves, nevertheless, to go to the Northland, without caring for the command of his mother, or the manifold ruin that his mother said was threatening him. He sets out, and by the use of magic gets safely through all the dangers that he meets with.

Lemminkainen comes to the Northland and behaves very superciliously. The master of Pohiola falls into a passion, and, when he finds that his magic avails nothing against Lemminkainen, he turns to his sword. But in the duel he is killed by Lemminkainen and his head struck off his shoulders. To avenge this murder, the mistress of the Northland sends her armed bands after him.

Lemminkainen hastily escapes from the Northland, returns home and asks his mother where he can conceal himself from the Northern people, who will soon appear in mass against him. His mother reproaches him with his journey to the North, and after much consideration, advises him to seek an island beyond many seas, where previously her husband had lived in peace during the great year of war.

Lemminkainen now sails over the sea, and succeeds in reaching the island. There he seduces all the women till the men resolve to kill him, so that he hastily leaves the island, greatly to his own regret as well as that of the girls. When at sea his boat is wrecked in a violent storm, but he swims to land, gets a new boat and coasts along to his home. Finding the house burned down and all the place despoiled, he begins to weep and cry, thinking his mother is dead. She, however, is still alive in a hiding-place on the edge of the forest, where Lemminkainen finds her to his great joy. His mother tells how the Northland people came and burned up the house; and he promises to build a new and better one after he has taken revenge on the people of the Northland for this crime, and tells his mother of his luxurious life in the island.

Lemminkainen sets out again with Tiera, his former companion in arms, to subdue the Northland.

The mistress of Pohiola sends against them a mighty frost, which freezes their boat in, and would have overcome them too, if they had not escaped through the charms and spells of Lemminkainen. They get over the ice to the shore, wander in the wilderness in great distress, and at last reach home.

Untamo makes war against his brother Kalervo ; kills Kalervo and all his host, and leaves alive only one woman, of an enchanted body. He takes her home, and she gives birth there to a child, Kullervo. Even in his cradle, Kullervo meditates revenging himself on Untamo, and Untamo tries in vain to kill him, but he can neither drown him, burn him, nor hang him. When Kullervo has grown larger he ruins everything he is set to work at, until at last Untamo in his anger sells him as a slave to Ilmarinen.

Ilmarinen's wife makes Kullervo her herdsman, and out of malice bakes him a stone in the bread she gives him for lunch ; then she sends him out with the flock to the meadows, with prayers against the bears.

Toward night Kullervo takes the bread out of his wallet, begins to cut it, and breaks his knife, which makes him very angry, as this was the only relic he had of his family. He resolves to revenge himself on his mistress ; drives his herd into the swamps, and collects a herd of wolves and bears, which he drives home at night ; when his mistress goes to milk them she is torn to pieces, and killed by the wild animals.

Kullervo runs away from Ilmarinen, wanders sorrowfully through the forest, and learns at last from an old woman that his parents and family are still alive ; and after further journeying he finds them on the borders of Lapland. His mother tells him how she had long believed him dead, and further, how her eldest daughter was lost, having gone after berries.

Kullervo attempts to perform various tasks for his parents, but as he is of no assistance, and always makes matters worse, his father sends him to pay the taxes on his land. On his way home he meets his lost sister, whom he does not recognize, but whom he seduces, and takes along with him. But when on the next day the truth is discovered, his sister drowns herself, and Kullervo hastens home, tells his mother the horrible story, and wishes to make an end of his own life. His mother tries to dissuade him, and advises him to seek some alleviation of his grief in some concealment, but he resolves first to take revenge on Untamo.

Kullervo prepares himself for war, and with light heart abandons his home, where no one but his mother will care for his death. He comes to Untamo's dwelling, tears it down, and burns it; and on his return home he finds the place abandoned, and no living thing but a black dog, with which he goes into the forest to shoot for his subsistence. On the way he comes to the spot where he had intercourse with his sister, and out of remorse stabs himself with his sword, and dies.

Ilmarinen weeps for his wife night and day, not knowing where to get another. At last he makes a woman out of gold and silver, which, after much trouble, he brings to life, but which he cannot make speak. He sleeps at night by the side of his golden bride; but finds, when he wakes up in the morning, that the side which he had turned to the golden image is very cold. He wishes to give the golden bride to Wainamoinen, but he will have nothing to do with it, and advises his brother to forge it into other things.

Ilmarinen goes to the Northland to woo the younger sister of his wife, but receives only insults for answer. Angry at this, he carries her off by force, but she abuses him so much on the way that he changes her into a sea-gull. On his return he tells Wainamoinen of his wooing, and of the happiness that is enjoyed at Pohiola through the magical effect of the Sampo.

Wainamoinen induces him to join in an expedition after this precious talisman. Ilmarinen agrees to it, and forges a large sword and splendid armor, then both seek for horses to ride ; but Wainamoinen hears a boat sighing on the edge of the sea, and complaining of being left in idleness, and of no longer ploughing the waves. The two heroes, touched by its complaints, take it for their voyage—Wainamoinen steering, and Ilmarinen rowing. They meet Lemminkainen, who has a revenge to take on Pohiola, and who gladly joins them.

They come at last to a water-fall, and all at once their boat stops, and they find that it is aground on the back of a huge pike. Wainamoinen kills the pike with his sword; disposes its bones into the form of a harp, and strings them with cords made of the hair of the steeds of Hiisi. Ilmarinen, Lemminkainen, and all the inhabitants of Pohiola in vain attempt to play upon this harp, but can make only discordant sounds. Wainamoinen at last takes the harp and begins to play, so that all living creatures in the air, the earth, and the water throng around to listen. Their hearts are all so moved by his playing that tears come into their eyes; great drops fall from Wainamoinen's eyes even, and roll into the water, where they are changed to beautiful pearls.

The heroes come to the Northland, and demand a part of the Sampo. "No," Louhi says ; "one cannot share the ermine, and the squirrel is too little for three." As she has summoned all her troops for war, Wainamoinen takes his harp and throws the whole people of Pohiola into a deep sleep ; then they get possession of the Sampo, put it in their boat, and start gaily for home. Three days afterwards, when they see the doors of their house, Wainamoinen sings a joyful song, at which Louhi and her people wake from their trance, and when she finds that the Sampo is gone, she sends a thick mist and a violent wind. In the storm Wainamoinen's harp falls into the sea.

Louhi gets into a boat and pursues the heroes, but Wainamoinen sinks her boat with a rock. She then changes into an eagle, and seizes the Sampo in her claws. The swords of Ilmarinen and Lemminkainen produce no effect on her, but Wainamoinen beats her with the rudder till all the armed men drop from under her wings and all her claws are broken except one, with which she throws the Sampo into the sea. It breaks, the larger parts sink, and the smaller ones float to the shore, where Wainamoinen collects them, and Louhi flies off with the cover only.

Wainamoinen tries to fish up his harp, but he cannot find it. He then makes another out of the branches of a solitary birch-tree, which was bemoaning its loneliness and its misfortunes, and strings it with the hair of a love-sick girl. He plays on it, and all the country rejoices.

The mistress of the Northland sends plagues and diseases to Kaleva. Wainamoinen heals his people by charms, and drives the plagues elsewhere.

She then sends a bear against the herds in Kaleva. Wainamoinen kills the bear, and the usual banquet of rejoicing is held, at which Wainamoinen sings and plays, and argues future prosperity for his people.

The moon and sun come down to listen to his playing, and Louhi gets them into her power and conceals them in a magic mountain. She also steals the fire from Wainamoinen's hearth. Ukko, the god of the air, is displeased at the darkness in heaven, and strikes fire for a new moon and a new sun. The fire falls down to earth, and Wainamoinen and Ilmarinen set out to find it. The daughter of the air tells them that the fire fell into the Alue Sea and was swallowed by a fish there. They try unsuccessfully to catch the fish with a net of bark-cord.

They make a linen net of flax growing on the shore of the Alue Sea, and catch the fish, in whose mouth the fire is found. The fire escapes from them, badly burning Ilmarinen's hands and cheeks, seizes the woods, and devastates many countries, and runs still further, till they at last get possession of it and bring it to the dark houses of Kaleva.

Ilmarinen, after being cured of his burns, forges a new moon and a new sun, but cannot make them shine. Wainamoinen learns that the sun and moon are concealed in a mountain in the Northland, and goes after them, and slays the whole people. Not being able to get the sun and moon, he returns home for tools to open the magic mountain. While Ilmarinen is forging them, Louhi comes in the form of a swallow to ask him what he is making. He says, "An iron collar for the mistress of Pohiola." On which she, fearing, lets the sun and moon out of the mountain. When Wainamoinen sees them again in heaven, he sings a song of joy.

The virgin Maryatta bears a son. The child is lost in a swamp and at last found again there. It is taken to the priest to be baptized, but Wainamoinen orders it to be killed and drowned. The child, only two weeks old, says that Wainamoinen has judged unjustly. On which the priest baptizes it, and it grows and becomes king of the forests and the isles. The old Wainamoinen, sad and confused, sails off in a copper boat to the horizon, between heaven and earth, where he still dwells. He left Finland, however, his harp and his songs.

WAINAMONINEN'S SOWING.

I.

WAINAMOINEN'S SOWING.

All the ocean isles and islets
Had been duly made and fashioned ;
All the ocean reefs and ledges
Had been duly wrought and founded ;
All the shining silver pillars
Of the firmament uplifted,
And the hills with crystal sprinkled,
And the highlands water-channelled ;
All the prairies had been levelled,
And the meadows wide unfolded.

Then at last in lapse of ages,
By the will of mighty Ukko,¹
Ukko mighty Lord above us,

To the world was born the minstrel,
Finland's mighty sage and singer,
Wise and prudent Wainamoinen,
Of a goddess fair descended,
Daughter of the air and ocean.

Full of glory grew the forest,
Leaf and branch in beauty flourished,
All the race of herbs and grasses,
All the tribe of reeds and sedges.
Birds sang sweetly in the tree-tops,
Making music all the day long,
Cheerily chirped the noisy throistle,
Sweetly sang the low-voiced cuckoo.

Berries grew upon the mountains,
Golden flowers adorned the meadows,
Leaf and fruit of every flavor,
Bush and herb of every fashion ;
All things fair and lovely flourished,

All things save the one most precious
Fruit of fruits, the golden barley.

Then one morning Wainamöinen
Taking from his pouch of leather
Six small seeds of golden barley
Sallied forth the seed to scatter.
Six small seeds of golden barley
He had found upon the sea-shore,
On the mighty water's edges,
And with loose and sandy pebbles
Had concealed them in his skin-pouch,
In his pouch of squirrel-leather.

As he sowed he chanted ever,
"Blessing to the seed I scatter,
For it falls upon the meadow,
By the grace of Ukko mighty,
Through the open finger-spaces
Of the hand that all things fashioned,

Falls to rise again in beauty,
Evermore to spring and flourish.

“Queen of meadow-land and pasture
Bid the earth unlock her treasures,
Bid the soil the young seed nourish,
Never shall their teeming forces,
Never shall their strength prolific
Fail to nourish and sustain us,
If the Daughters of Creation,
They the free and bounteous givers,
Still extend their gracious favor,
Offer still their strong protection.

“Rise, O Earth! from out thy slumbers,
Bid the soil unlock her treasures,
Bid the blade arise in beauty,
Bid the stalk grow strong and stately;
On a thousand stems uplifted
Let the yellow harvest ripen,

Let it cover all my cornfields
Hundred-fold for seed I planted.

“ Ukko mighty ! God above us,
Gracious Ukko ! Father in Heaven,
Thou who all the sky commandest,
For the fleecy clouds appointing
Every morn their course and pathway,
In thine airy realm consulting,
In thy kingdom taking counsel,
Send us clouds from East and North-East,
From the South and from the Sun-Set ;
Let them scatter drops refreshing ;
Bid them all their sweetness sprinkle
That the ear may lift its treasure
And the corn make haste to ripen.”

Gracious Ukko, Father in Heaven,
Heard the prayer the minstrel lifted,
From the South a cloud commanded

From the West despatched its fellow,
Bid one gather in the North-West,
And from out the East another,
Closing then their swarthy borders,
Crowding all in haste together,
Bade them all their sweetness sprinkle,
Scatter wide their drops refreshing,
That the ear might rise in beauty
And the corn make haste to ripen.
Soon from out the earth and darkness,
Lo, the tender blade uplifted,
And anon the ears unfolded,
Through the care of Wainamoinen.

Summer days had sped and vanished,
Days and nights a goodly number,
When the ancient Wainamoinen
Sought the field to see, if might be,
How his ploughing and his sowing

And his praying had been prospered.

Verily the corn had thriven

Wholly to the bard's contentment,

Lo. the ears in six rows seeded,

Waved o'er all the callow cornfield,

And the straw in three joints builded,

Covered all the teeming acres.

Glancing then a moment round him,

Near him lo! a little cuckoo,

And the birdling sang unto him,

Long the birch tree first surveying:

"Why when all the wood has fallen

Standeth there the slender birch tree?"

Spake in answer Wainamoinen:

"Therefore is the birch left standing

That its summit soaring skyward

Make for thee, my pretty birdling,

Station for thy cheerful singing.

Warble here my pretty birdling,
Silken throat and breast attuning,
Warble forth thy sweetest carol
Dulcet as a bell of silver.

“Sing at morn and sing at evening,
Sing when sunny noon is highest
Blessing to these chosen places,
Growth and greenness to our forests,
Wealth along our ocean borders
For our garner's rich abundance.”

THE RIVAL MINSTRELS.

II.

THE RIVAL MINSTRELS.

On the plains of Kalevala',
On the prairies of Wainola'
Chanting ever wondrous legends
Full of old time wit and wisdom
Wainamoinen, ancient minstrel,
Passed his days in sweet contentment.
All the day long sang the minstrel,
Often into dusky evening,
Now the tales of ancient heroes,
Legends of the time forgotten,
Now the story of creation,
Once familiar to our children,

Lisped, alas! of youth no longer,
Known but half by many a hero
In these mournful days degenerate,
Evil times our land befallen.

Far and wide the tidings travelled,
Far away men heard the story
Of this chant of Wainamoinen,
Of this song of mighty hero ;
Far to southward flew the echo,
Heart of Northland heard and listened.

There in dim and dusky Northland
Lived the singer Youkahainen,
Lapland's young and fiery minstrel.
One day feasting with his fellows
Came unto his ears the whisper,
On the meadows of Wainola,
On the meads of Kalevala,
They could boast a sweeter singer,

Better skilled to chant a legend,
Better far than Youkahainen,
Or the ancient one that taught him.

Thereupon the bard grew wrathful,
Envy swelled the minstrel's bosom,
Envy of this Wainamoinen
Famed to be so rare a singer.
Stormful hastes he to his mother,
To the ancient dame that bore him,
Vows that he will hie him northward,
Hasten northward and betake him
To the cabins of Wainola,
There as bard to offer battle,
There to striye with Wainamoinen.

"Nay," replies the fearful mother,
"Go not hence to Kalevala."

"Nay," the father answers, "go not
There to strive with Wainamoinen.

He will drive you forth in anger,
Turn to ice your supple ankles,
Blast with cold your cunning fingers,
Sink you in the smothering snow drift."

Then made answer Youkahainen :

"Good indeed a father's judgment,
Better still advice maternal,
Best of all one's own decision ;
Go I will, and, once before him,
Call him out to wordy battle ;
So will sing my ancient legends,
Chant my gathered store of wisdom,
That this boasted best of singers
Soon shall seem a sorry minstrel ;
Singing I will so transform him
That his feet shall turn to flintstone,
And to oak his nether garments,
And bewitched the bard shall carry

On his breast a stony burden,
On his shoulder bow of flintstone,
On his right hand stony gauntlet,
On his skull a stony visor."

Thereupon he goes forth raging,
From his stall leads forth a stallion,
Hot breath steaming from his nostrils,
From his hoofs bright flashes gleaming ;
Bridles swift the fiery charger,
To the golden runners links him,
Leaps into the sledge impetuous,
Springs upon the hindmost settle,
Fiercely strikes the fiery stallion
With his pearl-enamelled birch rod.
And the sledge now gayly springing,
Sallies swiftly on his journey ;
On he plunges restless northward,
All day long from noon till evening.

All day long, the next day, northward,
So the third from dawn till twilight
Till the third day evening brings him
To Wainola's peaceful meadows,
To the plains of Kalevala.

So it chanced that Wainamoinen,
Wainamoinen ancient minstrel,
Rode that evening on the highway,
Peacefully for pastime gliding
Down the meadows of Wainola,
O'er the plains of Kalevala.

THE ENCOUNTER.

III.

THE ENCOUNTER.

Forward comes the fiery stripling
Urging still his hot blood stallion,
Dashing down upon the minstrel,
Till they met in fierce collision.
Dripping hames are dashed together,
Steaming thills are tightly tangled,
Traces rattle upon traces,
Collar upon collar clatters,
So perforce they come to stand still,
So perforce a moment ponder,

Then the minstrel boldly cries out :

" Say who art thou ? stupid fellow
Coming dashing down the highway,
Crazily thy stallion urging,
Striking me in fierce encounter.

- Lo, my stallion's hame is shattered,
See his collar torn to atoms,
And my golden sledge demolished,
And its frame work all in flitters.
Let me know, thou stupid fellow,
Who thou art and whence thou comest."

Then the stripling boldly answered :

" I, be sure, am Youkahainen ;
But 'twere better thou shouldst tell me
Who thou art and whence thou comest,
Of what shabby race descended."

Then once more the ancient minstrel :

" If thy name be Youkahainen,

Make me way, thou silly stripling,
Thou art but a boy before me."

But the youthful Youkahainen
Thus unto the greybeard answered :

" Little matter one or fourscore,
Little boots it youth or ancient ;
Who in knowledge stands the highest,
Who in wisdom reaches highest,
He shall hold the middle roadway
And the other yield him passage.
Art thou ancient Wainamoinen,
He, the far-famed bard magician,
Let us sing each one his legends,
Let each tell his store of wisdom
So that each may judge the other,
And in rival song do battle."

Then made answer Wainamoinen,
Wainamoinen old and truthful :

"I shall do no deed for wonder,
Marvel am I not in singing,
All my peaceful life has glided
Down a dim and desert region,
All the song my ears have gathered
Is the cuckoo's simple measure."

YOUKAHAINEN'S SONG.

IV.

YOUKAHAINEN'S SONG.

"Yet as you will have it, stripling.
Come now tell me, golden stripling,
Tell me straight your store of wisdom,
What you know more than another."

Spake in answer Youkahainen :

"Many a little matter know I ;
This meanwhile as clear as sunlight,
Offspring of my wondrous cunning ;
Every oven has its hearthstone,
Every roof should have its chimney,
Merrily the seal disports him,

And the sea-dog's life is lusty
Champing up the friendly whiting,
Gulping down incautious salmon ;
Whiting love the quiet shallows,
Salmon choose the level spaces,
Spawns the pike when nights are frosty
Waiting for the winter tempest,
Slowly swims the perch in autumn,
Wry-necked, seeking deeper places,
In the summer spawns in shallows,
Oceanward then swiftly hastens.

“If this wisdom seems too little,
Still I know full many a matter.
Many a trifle I can tell you :
Southward mares are trained for ploughing,
In the north the patient reindeer,
Further Lapland ploughs with oxen,
Pisa' hill's tall forests know I,

Horna^a rock and all its fir-trees,
Trees of each are tall and slender,
Spindling forests cap the mountains.

“ Waterfalls are three in number,
Three in number are the oceans,
Three in number lofty mountains
'Neath the bending arch of heaven.
'Near to Yamen^a ; Hallapyora,
Kaatrakoski^a in Karyala,
Stern Imatra^a, all consenting
Overtopping lofty Wuoksen^a.”

Then spake ancient Wainamoinen :
“ Old wives' tales and wit of children
Little suit the bearded hero,
Man once old enough to marry ;
Tell me of the world's beginning,
And rehearse to me the nature
Of the countless creatures in it.”

Spake in answer Youkahainen,
Thus replied the youthful minstrel :
 " Verily I know the titmouse,
Titmouse is a tiny birdling,
Vipers green a race of serpents,
Perch are fish that swim the rivers,
Heart of iron grows daily weaker,
Sable earth is always bitter,
Heat of fire is full of danger,
Water where it boils, malicious,
Water is of all things oldest,
Foam most ancient means of magic,
God on high our first Physician,
God the first of all providers.
Fire to earth fell down from Heaven,
Water came from cloven mountain,
Iron was out of rust created,
Copper is of stone engendered."

As he pauses, Wainamoinen,
Old and truthful, asks the singer :

"Is this nonsense all thy wisdom,
Or hast somewhat more to utter?"

"Yea," said youthful Youkahainen,
"I can tell you still a trifle,
Legend of the time primeval,
When I ploughed the shoreless ocean,
Clove in twain its stormy pavements,
Burrowed deep the fishes' grottos,
Hollowed out its soundless caverns,
Where I lake and fen created,
Heavenward piled the rocks around them,
Lifted high o'er-topping mountains.
I, the sixth among the heroes,
Seventh among primeval heroes,
Out of nought the world created
And spread out the airy spaces,

Planting firm the crystal pillars
Underneath the heavenly arches.

“To her place the moon I pointed,
And the sun in heaven established,
All the sky with stars I planted,
And decreed the bear his station.”

“Verily,” said Wainamoinen,
“Lord thou art and prince of liars,
Ne’er wast present, vain pretender,
When the ocean plains were furrowed,
When its thousand isles were shapen,
Hollowed out the fishes’ caverns ;

“Ne’er wast present, shameless braggart,
When its soundless depths were sunken,
Lake and fen of nought created,
High the mountain peaks uplifted,
Rocks up-piled in towering masses ;
Never hadst been seen, thou boaster,
Never seen and never heard of.”

Then the youthful Youkahainen
Red with anger thus made answer :

“ So it be I fail in wisdom
I will of my sword demand it,
Come thou would-be bard and hero,
Come thou ancient wide-mouthed minstrel,
Let us then our broadswords measure,
Let us try our falchions' temper.”

Answered ancient Wainamoinen :
“ Never for a moment thought I
Sword of thine or wit thou vauntest,
Braggart wisdom, boasted cunning,
Each or all to fear an instant ;
Let who will accept thy challenge,
I will never, sorry fellow,
Sword of mine in battle measure,
Ne'er with thee a wight so paltry.”

Wagging then his head for anger,

Tossing wide his locks in fury,
Mouth awry, the youth made answer :

“ He who shuns the test of broadsword,
He who fears to trust his falchion,
Swine in heart to swine in aspect
Singing I will straight transform him ;
So I use this sort of hero.

Toss him here or there, as pleases,
Stamp him now upon the dung-hill,
Stall him now among the cattle.”

THE ENCHANTMENT.

V.

THE ENCHANTMENT.

Wrathful then grew Wainamoinen,
Wrathful waxed he, grimly frowning,
Broke his silence, self commanded,
And began his song entrancing.
Paltry tale the minstrel sang not,
Children's prattle, wit of women ;
Sang instead the long-beard hero,
Whom, alas ! our children know not,
Scarce the half our youth and maiden,
Scarce a third that woo and marry,
In these mournful days degenerate,
Evil times our race befallen.

Bravely sang the ancient minstrel,
Till the flinty rocks and ledges
Heard the trumpet tone and trembled,
And the copper-bearing mountains
Shook along their deep foundations,
Flinty rocks flew straight asunder,
Falling cliffs afar were scattered,
All the solid earth resounded
And the ocean billows answered.

And, alas! for Youkahainen,
Lo, his sledge so fairly fashioned
Floats a waif upon the ocean,
Lo, his pearl-enamelled birch-rod
Lies a weed upon the margin,
Lo, his steed of shining forehead
Stands a statue in the torrent,
And his hame is but a fir bough,
And his collar nought but corn-straw.

Still the minstrel sings unceasing,
And, alas! for Youkahainen,
Sings his sword from out his scabbard,
Hangs it in the sky before him
As it were a gleam of lightning,
Sings his bow so gayly blazoned
Into drift-wood on the ocean,
Sings his finely feathered arrows
Into swift and screaming eagles,
Sings his dog with crooked muzzle
Into stone dog squatting near him,
Into sea-flowers sings his gauntlets,
And his visor into vapor,
And himself the sorry fellow
Ever deeper in his torture
In the quicksand to his shoulder,
To his hip in mud and water.

Now, alas! poor Youkahainen,

Sorry stripling, comprehended
All too plainly what the end was
Of the voyage he had ventured,
Of this road his feet had travelled,
For the joy of wordy battle
With the ancient Wainamoinen.

First to lift his right foot seeking,
Sorry wight, the foot obeys not,
Striving next to stir the left one
Finds with flint the sole is shodden.
Then, alas ! poor Youkahainen
Falling into fear and torment,
Sinking deep in tribulation,
Thus addressed the ancient minstrel :

“O thou ancient Wainamoinen,
First and only true magician,
Do but turn away thy magic,
Make an end of thy enchantment,

Loose me from this frightful prison,
Free me from its pinching torment,
I will give you princely guerdon,
You shall win a noble ransom."

Spake the ancient Wainamoinen :
"What shall be the princely guerdon,
What shall be the noble ransom,
If I turn away the magic,
Make an end of the enchantment,
Loose you from this frightful prison,
Free you from its pinching torment?"

Answered youthful Youkahainen :
"In my cabin hang two cross-bows,
Verily two wondrous cross-bows,
Mighty one to drive an arrow,
One so lithe a child can span it ;
Choose between them mighty minstrel,
Take, O bard, whichever pleases."

Answered ancient Wainamoinen :

"Nay, I grudge thee not thy cross-bows,
Have indeed a few already,
In my cabin, ashen cross-bows
Cover every wall and chimney,
Hang on every peg and staple,
Bows that spurn the help of hunters,
Bows that go themselves a hunting."

Then said youthful Youkahainen :

"Near my cabin ride two shallops,
Verily two wondrous shallops,
Staunch the one to carry burdens,
Other swift to skim the water,
Choose, O minstrel, choose between them,
Take, O bard, whichever pleases."

"Nay," the minstrel spake in answer,

"Nay, I grudge thee not thy shallops,
Feel for such no inclination,

Have, indeed, a few already ;
All my shore is full of shallops,
Every trundle frame allotted ;
Some before the wind good sailors,
Mighty some to speed against it ;
So I grudge thee not thy shallops."

"In my stable stand two stallions,
Verily two priceless stallions,
One a courser swift as lightning,
Strong his mate to speed the snow-sledge,
Choose between them, mighty minstrel,
Take, O bard, whichever pleases."

"Nay, I grudge thee not thy stallions,
Have no need of dappled stallions,
Have, indeed, a few already
Munching grain at every manger ;
Stallions swarm in all my stables

Broad of back to hold the water
Sturdy rump of each doth gather."

"O, thou ancient Wainamoinen,
Only turn away thy magic,
Make an end of thy enchantment,
Gold and silver I will give thee,
Both in heaping measure pour thee,
Gold my father won in battle,
Silver in the fight with heroes."

"Nay, I grudge thee not thy silver,
Gold of thine, O fool, desire not,
Have, methinks, enough already ;
Crammed my cot in every chamber,
Every peg and pen allotted,
Gold that like the moonlight shimmers,
Silver like the gleam of sunlight."

"O, thou ancient Wainamoinen,

Lift me from this pit of horror,
Loose me from its pinching torment,
I will give thee all my corn ricks,
Pledge thee all the fields around them,
So my luckless life to ransom,
So once more to gain my freedom."

"Take thy corn to other market,
Find thy fields another owner,
My supply is all-sufficient ;
Fields I have on every upland,
Growing corn in every valley,
One's own fields are always fairer,
Corn they bear is far the sweeter."

THE BETROTHAL.

VI.

THE BETROTHAL

Now, alas ! poor Youkahainen
Finds himself in plight too wretched,
Over knees in ooze and rubbish,
Beard bedrabbled in the quagmire,
Mouth so tuneful stopped with litter,
Teeth entangled in the bushes.

Up from out this pit of horror
Spake again the luckless stripling :

" O thou wise and ancient minstrel,
First and only true magician,
Now at last withhold thy magic,
Loose me from this slough of horror,

And my joyous life restore me ;
For my eyes with sand are tortured,
Tides unseen begin to drag me.
Only turn away thy magic,
Make an end of thy enchantment,
I will pledge thee beauteous Aino,
Aino daughter of my mother,
Aino my beloved sister,
Bride of thine to be forever ;

“ Every morn to sweep thy cabin,
Bake the toothsome honey-biscuit,
Scour betimes thy beechen platters,
Deck thy bed with snowy linen,
Weave thy couch a golden cover,
All the place to hold in order.”

Glad of heart is Wainamoinen,
Full of joy the ancient minstrel,
That he thus has fought and won him

For his age a lovely maiden,
Sister of this Youkahainen.
So he seeks a place befitting,
Where to publish forth his pleasure,
Steps upon the rock of joyaunce,
On the stone of music seats him,
Sings a moment, sings and ceases,
Sings a second, then a third time,
So to turn away the magic,
So the potent spell to banish.

Now at last comes Youkahainen
Crawling from his oozy prison,
Lifts his knees from out the water,
Beard from out the bog and litter ;
From the rock starts forth his stallion,
From the bramble glides his snow-sledge,
And from out the sedge his birch rod.

Then he sets his sledge in order,

Resting not a moment mounts it
And betakes him swiftly homeward,
Woe-begone beyond expression
At the thought to meet his mother ;
Came, alas ! with pace so heedless,
Sledge against the grain house dashing,
Thill against the door-post striking,
Sledge and thill are dashed in pieces.
Such was Youkahainen's greeting
As he gained the ancient homestead ;
Fain to chide him spoke his mother,
But the father interrupted.

“Tell me, youth, is this thy pastime,
Sledge and thill to dash in pieces ?
Why returnest thou so seldom ?
Why this morning so demented ?”

Now, alas ! must Youkahainen
Freely pour his tears of anger ;

Cap awry upon his forehead,
Chin upon his bosom sunken,
Mouth drawn low in deep dejection,
Sorry sight he stands before them.

Then his mother, speaking gently,
Sought to win from him his secret.

"Tell me, son," she said, "thy sorrow,
Tell me, child, thy heart's affliction,
Why thy lips hang low and lifeless,
Why thy aspect so dejected,
Why thou weepest, speak and tell me."

Answered youthful Youkahainen:
"Mother dearest, thou that bore me,
Cause there is in what has happened,
Cause enough in that befallen,
Cause, alas! for bitter weeping;
Not alone to-day unhappy,
All my life must pass in sorrow.

For, O mother, thou that bore me,
Aino I, alas ! have promised,
Aino, my beloved sister,
Aino daughter of my mother,
Bride to be of Wainamoinen,
Prop beneath and roof above him."

Then the mother rose up gayly,
Clapped her hands in joy together.
"Weep not," said she, "son beloved,
Cause is none therein for weeping,
Ever I this hope have cherished,
All the years my soul possessing,
That one day the mighty minstrel,
He, the valiant Wainamoinen,
Spouse should be for lovely Aino,
Son-in-law for me her mother."

But the beauteous maiden Aino
Fell at once in bitter weeping,

Tearful lingered at the threshold,
Wept that day and all the night through,
Wept because a mighty sorrow,
Bitter sorrow filled her bosom.
Then her mother gently chiding :

“ Wherefore weep'st thou gentle Aino ?
Lordly wooer thou hast won thee,
Wide the door-way thou wilt enter,
There to while thee at the window,
There the oaken bench to scour.”

“ Dearest mother, thou that bore me,”
Gentle Aino spake in answer,
“ Cause is mine indeed for weeping,
Cause for bitter tears and sorrows ;
Well may Aino mourn, O mother,
Golden hair she took delight in,
Sunny softness of her tresses,
Trinkets wherewithal she decked them,

Shining braids she wove each morning,
All to be as nought hereafter,
Buried neath the linen bonnet
That the wife must wear forever :
Weep forever, childhood vanished,
Gentle moonlight, golden sunshine,
Joy and hope of all my lifetime
Now forever left behind me ;
Sadder yet the fate before me,
Soon, alas ! to be forgotten
In my father's humble cottage,
At the work-bench of my brother."

Then the mother answered, " Aino,"
Thus the ancient dame the maiden,
" Stay thy weeping, witless maiden,
Make an end of this thy folly,
Cause is none for thy repining,
Sun and moon shine all as brightly

On the roofs of other mortals.
Not upon the tool-bench solely
Where thou standest with thy brother,
Not within the window only
Where thou sitt'st beside thy father,
Not alone thy father's pasture,
Not alone thy brother's upland,
Yield the ripe and ruddy berries ;
Berries sprinkle other mountains,
Berries hide in other meadows ;
There canst go thyself and find them,
If thou wilt the day long find them,
There as well as here, O maiden."

1000

THE WOOING.

VII.

THE WOOING.

The next morn the maiden Aino,
Sister fair of Youkahainen,
Sought betimes the birchen forest
Brooms to bind and twigs to gather,
Choosing out the speckled birchwood ;
One to bring her father, binds she,
One a gift to bring her mother,
For her brother binds a third one.

Then by woodpath hastening homeward,
Flying from the forest darkness,
As she gains the bushy border,
Lo, before her Wainamoinen,

Deftly spying out the maiden

In her trimly buckled bodice.

Thus the ancient bard addressed her :

“Wear not, lovely maid, for others,

Only wear for me, O maiden,

Glossy pearls upon thy shoulders,

Shining cross” upon thy bosom ;

Bind with silk for me thy tresses,

Plait for me thy braidlets golden.”

But the maiden quickly answered :

“Nevermore for thee or others

Will I all my life remaining

Deck my hair with silken ribbon,

Or with golden cross my bosom ;

Nay, I need no more the trinkets

Hither brought by ship or shallop,

I will dress in humble raiment ;

All the food I ask a bread crust ;

- With my father dwell forever,
In the cabin with my mother."

Then the maid her hair unbinding
Slipped the gold rings from her fingers,
Tore the gold cross from her bosom
And unclasped the shining necklace ;
Once more then her wealth surveying,
Tossed her treasure in the brambles
And burst forth in bitter weeping,
As she took her pathway homeward.

At the window sat her father
Shaping out an ashen axe-helve,
From his work bench upward glancing :

"Why," he said, "comes Aino weeping,
Why my daughter sadly sobbing?"

And the tearful maiden answered :
"Cause she has for tears, O father,
Cause enough for bitter weeping,

Therefore comes she as you see her,
Therefore casts she cross and buckle,
Dearest treasures, careless from her ;
Brazen was the clasp thou gavest,
And the cross of purest silver."

In the doorway sat her brother,
Carving out an oaken oxbow ;
Resting from his toil a moment,
"Why," he said, "comes Aino weeping,
Why my sister sadly pining ?"

And the tearful maiden answered :
"Cause she has for tears, O brother,
Cause enough for bitter weeping,
Therefore comes she as you see her,
Ring no more upon her finger,
Necklace trampled in the forest ;
Golden was the ring thou gav'st her,
And the necklace molten silver."

On the door sill sat her sister
Weaving on a golden girdle ;
Dropping from her hand the shuttle,
"Why," she said, "comes Aino weeping,
Why my sister sadly sobbing ?"
And the tearful maiden answered :

"Cause she has for tears, O sister,
Cause enough for bitter weeping,
Therefore comes she as you see her,
Having thrown away and banished
Ribbons blue that decked her temples,
Fillet red that bound her forehead ;
In her ears no golden ear-drops,
In her hair no flash of silver."

In the doorway of the dairy,
Skimming cream sat Aino's mother.

"Why," she cried, "comes Aino weeping,
Why my daughter sadly sobbing ?"

"Mother dearest, thou that bore me,
At thy bosom fed and nursed me,
Cause I have enough for weeping,
Cause enough for bitter weeping.

"Late I sought the birchen forest
Brooms to bind and twigs to gather,
One I bound to give my father,
One for thee, O much loved mother,
For my brother bound a third one ;
Then by woodpath home returning,
Flying swiftly o'er the meadow,
From the corn cried Wainamoinen,
From the field the ancient minstrel,
Thus the graybeard bard addressed me :

"Wear not, lovely maid, for others,
Only wear for me, O maiden,
Glassy beads upon thy shoulders,
Golden cross upon thy bosom,

Bind with silk for me thy tresses,
Plait for me thy tresses golden.'

"Then I threw the gold cross from me,
From my breast the shining necklace,
Tore the ribbons from my temples,
From my head the scarlet fillet ;
Angrily I threw them from me,
Tossed them fiercely in the bramble,
Then the graybeard thus I answered :

"Never more for thee or others
Will I all my life remaining
Deck my hair with silken ribbon,
Or with golden cross my bosom ;
Nay, I need no more the trinkets
Hither brought by ship or shallop ;
I will dress in humble raiment ;
All the food I ask a bread-crust ;
With my father dwell forever,
In the cabin with my mother.'"

THE CONSOLATION.

VIII.

THE CONSOLATION.

Then the mother to the daughter,
Aged dame to youthful maiden :

“ Weep not more, I pray thee, daughter,
Waste not life so sweet in mourning ;
One year thou shalt eat sweet butter,
This will make thee lithe and slender ;
For a twelvemonth only boars’ meat,
That will make thee tall and stately ;
Dainty puddings all the third year,
That will make thee fair, my daughter.

“ Haste thee now unto the hill-top,
Hie thee swiftly to the store-house ;

Thou wilt find it crammed to ceiling,
Full of boxes and of clothes-chests
Piled the one upon the other ;
Open thou the best among them,
Lifting up the inlaid cover,
Thou wilt find there six in number
Gowns of blue cloth good to look on,
Fashioned by the moon's fair daughter,
By the sun's sweet offspring woven.
Once while I was yet a maiden
Hunting berries in the forest,
Raspberries upon the mountain,
So it chanced I heard the weird ones,
Her that calls the sun her father,
And her comrade, moon-descended,
Heard the whisper of their spinning,
Heard the whirring of their weaving,
Just within the greenwood shadow

On the forest's purple border ;
Tarrying not I hastened toward them,
In a moment stood beside them,
And began with soft entreaty ;
These the very words I uttered :

“ Daughter of the sun, O give me
Shining silver from thy coffers ;
Daughter of the moon, O deign me
Yellow gold from thine abundance ;
Pity on the dowerless maiden
Hither come to seek thy favor.’
And they listened to my asking,
And they gave me gold and silver,
Gold to hang upon my temples,
Silver in my hair to sprinkle.

“ Nimble then I hastened homeward,
Joyful to my father's cabin ;
Two days then I wore the trinkets,

But the third day ere the evening
Took the gold beads from my temples,
From my hair drew out the silver,
And unto the hill-top hasting,
To the store-house on the summit,
Laid them in the oaken clothes-chest ;
There to-day they lie in darkness.

“ Thither go, my dear-loved daughter,
Thither hie thee to the hill-top,
Then adorn with bows thy temples,
Deck them bright with silken ribbons,
Lay thy gold cross on thy bosom,
Hang with beads thy neck and shoulders,
So wilt thou be fair to look on.
Robe thy gentle limbs in linen,
Finest that the weaver fashions,
From thy waist hang woollen short frocks,
Circle it with silken girdle,

Then with shining silken stockings
And with shoes of finest leather,
Surely thou art fair to look on.
Braid thy hair in comely fashion,
Loop it up with silken ribbons,
Deck with gold thy limber fingers
And thy hands with linen ruffles.

“Come then to us by the hearth-fire;
Sweet and fair will be the vision,
And when forth thou goest stately,
From the cabin threshold gliding,
It will be a joy to see thee;
Joy and pride to all our kinsmen,
Honor to our fame ancestral;
Thou wilt bear thee like a lily
Or some tall and queenly berry,
For thy face will then be fairer,
Statelier thy step and presence.”

So the mother spoke to Aino,
So the dame unto the maiden.
But the maiden, scarcely hearing,
Less the cheerful counsel heeding,
Hurried from the cabin threshold,
Hastened to the empty court-yard,
There alone long time she lingered,
These the plaintive words she uttered :

“Unto what thing shall I liken
Joys of fortune, favored mortals ?
I will liken them to water,
Unto water flowing yonder,
Water bright in yonder basin.
Unto what the bitter sorrow
Of the wretched fate neglected ?
Water in the well imprisoned,
Icicle in cruel winter.

“Oft, alas ! the wayward fancy,

Foolish maiden's wayward fancy,
Seizing her in dream and vision,
Whirls her on a fearful journey ;
Now it seems she sweeps in terror
Through the prickly fields of stubble,
Then again she sweetly glideth
Over green and sunny meadows,
Then she pushes on through brambles
Till her veins are black to bursting,
Heart the meanwhile white with terror.

“ Ah ! for me 'twere so much better
Had I never seen the daylight,
Or if born had never thriven,
Never grown to be a maiden,
In these days so sad and evil,
Underneath a sky so joyless ;
If when seven short days had vanished
I had died upon the eighth day,

I was then so low of stature,
I had needed little linen,
And of sod the smallest measure.
Mother mine had mourned a little,
And my father too a trifle,
Brother too perhaps a moment,
So had all been past and over."

So the maiden pined the day through,
So she pined the eve and morrow,
Then again her mother asked her :

"Why art weeping, lovely Aino?
Why art pining, dearest daughter?"

And the maiden then made answer :-
"Therefore I must weep and sorrow,
Wretched maiden pine forever,
For that thou thy child hast promised,
Sold away thy little daughter
To a graybeard old and limpsey,

Joy to be unto his dotage,
Comfort to his years declining,
Out of doors a staff to stay him,
In the house a shield around him.

“ Better had it been to send me
Low to live beneath the sea-foam,
There to be the whiting's sister,
And the friend of nimble fishes ;
Better surely swim the sea-foam,
In the billows sport and linger,
Better be the whiting's sister,
Mate and friends of little fishes,
Than to be an old man's darling,
Prop to stay him when he trembles,
Arm to aid him when he staggers,
When he falls the hand to lift him ;
Better far a whiting's sister,
Than an old man's slave and darling.”

THE FLIGHT.

IX.

THE FLIGHT.

Then she hastened to the hill-top,
To the store-house on the summit,
There as bid the great room opened
And sought out the precious clothes-chest.
As she lifts the inlaid cover,
O'er its wealth in wonder kneeling,
Lo, before her richly folded
See the six gold girdles lying,
And the blue gowns seven in number.

From the full provision choosing,
Robe and girdle well selecting,
Aino clad herself as bidden,

Decked herself to look her fairest,
Gold upon her snowy temples,
Silver on her braided tresses,
Scarlet band across her forehead,
Ribbons blue upon her shoulders,
Nought poor Aino has forgotten
That she so may seem her fairest.

Then she wanders from the hill-top
Down across the slope and meadow,
Hurries on through bog and stubble,
Plunges into fen and forest,
Then emerges careless whither,
Ever singing as she wanders,
And her mournful chant was this wise :

"Woe is me, my heart is broken,
Torture cruel racks my temples,
None the worse would be my anguish,
None the deeper sting the sorrow

If beneath the burden sinking,
In my bosom's deep dejection
I should yield my life forever,
Luckless maiden now should perish ;
Yea, the time has come for Aino
From beneath the sky to hasten
To the realm of the departed,
Underneath to Mana's kingdom."

"Sorrow not for me, O father,
Blame me not, O dearest mother,
Brother mine, O shed no tear drop,
Weep not, sister, but forget me
When ye hear that luckless Aino
Sought afar the teeming ocean,
Leaped to meet the foamy billow,
Made her bed in deeps of ocean,
Swarthy slime her couch and pillow."

All that day the maiden wandered,

All the morrow sad and weary,
So the next day, till at evening
As the cruel night descended,
Lo, she gained the curving sea-shore,
Lo, before her then the ocean.

All the evening wept the maiden,
All the night long wandered weary
Up and down the pebbly margin ;
In the morning looking round her
Fixed her maiden gaze intently
On the headland jutting seaward.
Sweet sea maidens three in number
She could spy along the ledges,
Now upon the rocks reposing,
Now disporting in the billows,
Sweet sea maidens three in number ;
Four to make them hastens Aino,
Five the fairy truncheon counted.

Then the little maid disrobing
Hangs her short frock on the alders,
On the earth lets fall her stockings,
On the rock her tiny sandals,
In the sand her shining necklace,
And her rings among the pebbles,
Then upon a patch of verdure
Lightly drops her snow-white linen.

In the sea a little distance
Stood a stone of many colors,
Gleaming in the sunlight golden ;
Toward it leaped the little maiden,
Thither swam the luckless Aino,
Up the shining stone had clambered,
There a moment fain to linger,
When upon a sudden swaying
Seaward, then a moment sinking
Down upon the slimy bottom,

Far beneath the wave of ocean
Fell the stone of many colors.

With it fell the luckless maiden
Clinging to its rocky bosom,
With it sank the maiden Aino
Down beneath the bed of Ocean,
So the little maiden vanished,
So the luckless Aino perished,
Singing as the stone fell seaward,
Chanting still as she descended :

“ Once to swim I sought the sea-side,
In the foamy waves to frolic ;
Woe is me, I fell in headlong,
Like a little bird I perished.
Never come a-fishing hither,
Never to the shore of ocean,
Never in thy lifetime, father,
As thou lovedst little Aino.

" Mother, dear, I sought the sea-side
In the foamy waves to frolic ;
Woe is me, I fell in headlong,
Like a little birdling perished.
Never mix thy bread, O mother,
With the water of this ocean,
Never in thy lifetime, mother,
As thou lovedst little Aino.

" Brother, dear, I sought the sea-side
In the foamy waves to frolic ;
Woe is me, I fell in headlong,
Like a little birdling perished.
Never bring the steed to water,
Royal racer, never hither,
Never in thy lifetime, brother,
Never to this cruel sea-shore.

" Sister dear, I sought the sea-side
In the foamy waves to frolic ;

Woe is me, I fell in headlong,
Like a little birdling perished.
Never may'st thou, dearest sister,
Hither come to lave those eyelids
In the cruel ocean water.

"All the waters of the ocean
Shall be blood of Aino's body,
All the fish that swim the ocean
None the less the flesh of Aino,
All the bushes on the border
Shall be Aino's ribs forever,
All the grass along the margin
Sprouted from her sea-worn tresses."

So at last the maiden vanished,
So at last poor Aino perished.
Who shall bear the cruel tidings?
Who shall tell the cruel story,
At the pretty maiden's cottage,

At the home of lovely Aino?
Shall the swarthy bear be herald,
Homeward bring the cruel story?
Nay, the bear cannot be herald,
He would tear the peaceful cattle.
Who shall bring the cruel tidings,
Who shall tell the cruel story,
At the pretty maiden's cottage,
At the home of lovely Aino?
Shall the yellow wolf be herald,
Homeward bear the cruel tidings?
Nay, the wolf cannot be herald,
He would frighten sheep and shepherd.
Who then bear the cruel tidings?
Who then tell the cruel story,
At the pretty maiden's cottage,
At the home of lovely Aino?
Shall the cunning fox be herald,

Tell at home the cruel story ?

Nay, the fox the geese would slaughter,

Nay, the fox cannot be herald.

Who then bear the cruel tidings ?

Who then tell the cruel story,

At the pretty maiden's cottage.

At the home of lovely Aino ?

Shall the timid hare be herald,

Homeward bear the evil tidings ?

And the timid hare made answer :

" I will bear the evil tidings."

Swiftly then the hare went forward,

Lively scampered herald Long-Ear,

Swift as wind Sir Crookleg gallops,

Alway with his head one-sided,

Till he reached the maiden's cabin,

Found the home of lovely Aino.

Silent is the house and empty,

So he seeks the steaming bath-house,
Finding there a flock of maidens,
Each in hand a speckled birch-broom,
There he squats upon the threshold.
"Look you, squint-eye, we shall stew you,"
So the flock of maidens greet him,
"Round eye we shall surely roast you,
May-be for my lady's breakfast,
Or perhaps her husband's supper,
May-be for her daughter's luncheon,
Or perchance young master's dinner,
Surely for the one or other.
So 't were better you should scamper,
To your cozy forest burrow,
Fast as crooked legs can take you."
Then did Long-Ear thus make answer,
Loud reciting his oration :
"Think you Lempo" travelled hither

All on purpose to be roasted ?
Nay, I come to bring you tidings,
Here to tell a mournful story.
Perished is the pretty maiden,
She that wore the golden necklace,
She that bore the silver bracelets
And the brass bespangled girdle,
Aye beneath the sea-wave sunken,
In the ocean's spacious caverns,
There to be the whiting's sister,
Mate and friend of nimble fishes."

Sorely weeps the blue-eyed mother,
And the tears that fall are bitter,
As in sad and trembling accents,
Woe-begone she maketh answer :
"Listen, oh ! ye mothers, listen,
Never from the roof paternal
Hurry forth unwilling daughters,

Ne'er to bridegroom that she loves not,
Ne'er as I, alas ! unhappy,
Drove, alack, my lovely Aino."
Sorely weeps the blue-eyed mother,
And the bitter tears come falling,
From her blue eyes red with sorrow
Down across her furrowed visage,
Till they reached her heaving bosom,
And athwart her heaving bosom,
And across her garment's border,
And adown her red striped stockings,
Till they reached the shining sandals ;
Then beneath her shining sandals,
Ever with a ceaseless flowing,
Part to earth for its possession,
Part to water for its portion,
As they fall, and falling, mingle,
Streamlets form they, three in number,

Flowing on like crystal rivers,
Gathered all of single tear-drops,
Precious drops that fell and trickled
From the mother's wrinkled eyelids.
In each swiftly flowing torrent,
Lo ! a cataract is foaming,
Foaming with a fiery splendor
From each cataract's commotion,
Rise three rocks above the tumult,
From each rock, upon its summit,
Soars aloft a grassy hillock ;
On each hillock slender birch-trees
Struggle skyward, three in number ;
On the summit of each birch-tree
Sits a pretty cuckoo birdling,
And the three sing altogether.
"Love ! O Love !" the first one singeth,
And another, "Suitor ! Suitor !"

And the third sings, "Joyful ! Joyful !"

And the one "O Love !" that singeth,

Singeth so three moons unceasing,

For the love-refusing maiden

Now beneath the billow sleeping—

And the one that singeth "Suitor,"

He will sing six moons unceasing,

All in honor of that suitor

Who will vainly sue forever.

And the one that singeth "Joyful,"

He will sing, alas ! the lifetime

Of that sad and joyless mother,

Who sits weeping now forever.

There, alas ! the wretched mother,

Burst forth into mournful singing,

As she heard the cuckoo calling,

And her mournful song was this wise :

"When the cuckoo-birdling calleth,

Then, alas ! my heart seems breaking.
Bitter tears unlock my eyelids,
Older grow my stiffened elbows,
Weak are as a babe's my fingers,
Yea, my worn-out body trembles
Wearily in all its members,
When I hear the cuckoo calling."

See marked portion on pp. 23-24

NOTES.

NOTES.

- ¹ Page 49.—Ukko, the old one, originally the same as Jumala, the heaven, then the god of heaven, and finally the god of all things, the Father of all.
- ² Page 59.—Kaleva, the home of heroes, the abode of Wainamoinen, the region of light, as contrasted with Pohiola, the land of darkness.
- ³ Page 59.—Wainola, the home of Wainamoinen, or Waino. Grienon derives their names from the Lapp vaino, desire.
- ⁴ Page 74.—Pisa, a mountain in Finland.
- ⁵ Page 75, Horna, a rock in Finland.
- ⁶ Page 75.—Yasmen, the district of Finland now called Tavastehus. Hallapyora is a lake and water-fall near by.

* Page 75.—Kaatrakoski, a waterfall in Karjala, now Carelia.

• Page 75.—Imatra, a celebrated waterfall near Viborg.

• Page 75.—Wuoksen, a river in Eastern Finland.

• Page 108.—This passage shows how Christian ideas have crept into the Pagan Epic.

• Page 131.—Mana, another name of Tuoni, the god of death, who inhabits Manala, the lower world.

• Page 139.—Lempe, a name for the hare.

1971

.

.

THE BORROWER WILL BE CHARGED
THE COST OF OVERDUE NOTIFICATION
IF THIS BOOK IS NOT RETURNED TO THE LIBRARY ON OR BEFORE THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW.

CANCELLED

SEP 3 - 1979

625 2852

BOOK ONE
REB 10 1988

FEB 19 1988

2549206

STALL STUDY

CHARGE

MAY 10 1997

SEP 10 1997

BOOK ONE

FEB 2 1988

14131

CANCELLED

954 792